Rural Life in the Backwoods Fifty Years Ago.

The creak of the cider mill was a familiar sound fifty years ago up among the hills up North, where the farmers had orchards of natural fruit on the hillsides. Natural fruit was the yield of apple trees that had not been graft-The seed of a Baldwin or of any other fine variety of apple will produce a tree that will bear natural fruit.

Where land was cheap farmers set out orchards of young seedlings, but often neglected to graft the trees and the crchard grew up to bear only natural fruit. Such apples were good for worth perpetuating by grafting or bud-

The creak of the old-time cider mill was one of the familiar sounds of the early winter. After the farmers had housed their corn and pumpkins and gathered their apples they made a few parrels of cider out of natural fruit. Somewhere in the neighborhood was a cider mill that anybody could use. There was no regular charge for using it, but the farmers usually left a bar-rel or two of cider as toll when they rel or two of cider as toll when they took their product away.

The mill was a good-sized shed, usually open on one side. The grinder consisted of two upright wooden cylinders of hard maple, perhaps three feet high and eighteen inches in diameter. Around the surfaces were wooden cogs, each of which fitted into a slot in the other cylinder.

To the top of one cylinder a long sweep was mortised. There was a hopper that fed the apples to the cylinders, nd a vat below caught the pulp as it ame through.

A horse was hitched to the end of the A horse was hitched to the end of the sweep, and as he walked slowly around the old mill creaked and the crushed apples came through. As the mill grew older the apples came through rather badly cracked, but far from crushed. But apples were plenty, and the clear cider came from those half crushed apples!

The cider press was as primitive as came from those half crushed apples! The cider press was as primitive as the grinder. It consisted of a bed of heavy planks, set sianting, with gouged channels to lead the apple juice to the point where it flowed into a big kettle. In the frame above this bed were two screws made of logs perhaps ten inches in diameter, fitting into a threaded beam above. Near the lower ends of the screws were hubs, with mortises in them for hand-spikes. A heavy square of planks, to be used as a follower, completed the press.

of planks, to be used as a follower, completed the press.

It was something of an art to put the pumice in the press. First a layer of straw was placed around the edges of the bed, somewhat like the fringe of a mat. Then a layer of pumice was shoveled on with a scoop shovel, and the outer ends of the straw were folded in ward over the crushed apples.

Another fringe of straw was laid around, another layer of pumice shovelled on and the ends of the straw folded over as before. The process was repeated until the cheese was built up three or four feet high or more, when the follower was put on top and the screws turned down. A few twists with the handsoikes set the cider flowing in a clear stream.

There was almost no sediment in this clear stream.

There was almost no sediment in this cider after it had been barrelled. If the pulp could have been taken from the pressed cheese and subjected to modern methods it would have yielded perhaps as much cider as had been aiready expressed from it. But what the farmers got was good cider.
